Learning to Hear the Sung Mass: Part V – Listening with the Monks

Anyone who sings Gregorian chant today owes an enormous debt to a community of Benedictine monks in western France. The Abbey of Solesmes is often spoken of as though it "restored" Gregorian chant. That is true—but only in part.

The monks were not trying to recreate ancient music for museums or concert halls. They were trying to recover the Church's own way of praying.

In the 1830s, Dom Prosper Guéranger restored Benedictine life at Solesmes after the upheavals of the French Revolution. He believed the renewal of Catholic worship required a return to the Church's authentic liturgical tradition, and Gregorian chant naturally became part of that vision. His successors carried the work further.

Dom Joseph Pothier painstakingly compared medieval manuscripts to recover the melodies themselves. Dom André Mocquereau explored their rhythm. Dom Joseph Gajard spent decades forming generations of monks and choirs in the spiritual interpretation of the chant. Finally, Dom Eugène Cardine turned his attention to the oldest surviving manuscripts and demonstrated that their tiny signs — the ancient neumes — were not primitive notation but subtle guides to expression. This changed everything.

The earliest manuscripts did not simply preserve the notes; they preserved the way the Church had prayed those notes. The neumes suggested where a melody should broaden, where it should lighten, where a word deserved particular emphasis, and where the singer should move forward. They revealed that Gregorian chant was never intended to be mechanically regular or metrically rigid — its rhythm arose from the sacred text itself.

When we hear Gregorian chant today, we are not listening to an archaeological reconstruction. We are hearing a living tradition that generations of monks have lovingly received, studied, and handed on.

The monks of Solesmes did far more than preserve ancient melodies. They helped us rediscover how those melodies pray.
